DAYTON, Ohio, February 22, 1973 --- The Board of Trustees of the University of Dayton today (February 22nd) approved the development of a market analysis and feasibility study on the possibility of reopening the University's law school.

The proposal would be part of a continuing study on how the University can best serve the local and national communities.

The University awarded its last law degree in 1935.

The study would include the need for such an academic school, the extent to which the school would draw local and national support, its initial costs, particularly in library holding, administrative and faculty salaries, and the attitude of those men and women in the law profession toward such an undertaking.

The Board asked that the University administration conduct the analysis study and that a progress report be made at the May 17th meeting.
